

A SECOND LOOK

The bed, as the warmest room

In fuyugomori, the bed stops being just where the day ends and becomes the warm centre the household draws toward. Dress it the way you'd build the living room: in layers of one warm tone, not a single heavy duvet.

Stonewashed linen for the base, a flat wool blanket folded across the foot, a chunkier knit thrown on top — the same two-weights rule that warms a sofa.

Keep the nightstand to one lamp, one book, one stem. The bedroom is the easiest room to over-fill and the one that punishes it most: clutter at eye level as you fall asleep is the opposite of the den you're trying to keep. One warm light, low; everything else, away.

Stonewashed linen pillowcases

Oat, pre-softened — the layer your face meets. The cheapest luxury in the house.

$ SHOP →

Tan-taupe knit throw

The top weight across the foot of the bed — warmth you add, not a duvet you swap.

$ SHOP →