

A NOTE ON BUYING

One a month, not twelve at once

The fastest way to get Japandi wrong is to buy the whole mood board in a weekend. A room assembled at once looks assembled. A room that arrives one considered object a month — the lamp in November, the throw in December, the vase when you find the right one — looks lived in, because it was.

So take this edit as a year, not a basket. The light first, because it changes everything for the least money. The cloth next, because winter is asking. The clay and the wood when the right piece appears, and not before.

"A room you can finish in a weekend is a room you'll redo in a year."
