

A SECOND LOOK

The entry, woken up

The entry is the room a household neglects and a guest reads first. In spring it earns five minutes. Clear the bowl of winter scarves into a single basket below a slim console. Set one branch and one stoneware dish on top — keys land in the dish, nothing else does. Hang a single framed print at eye height, off-centre to the console, not floating in the wall's middle.

That is the whole intervention: a surface, a thing beneath it, one living branch, one print. The first impression of the home becomes a small composition rather than a dumping ground — and it took nothing but subtraction and a cutting from the garden.

Slim oak console table Narrow enough for a hallway, honest enough to last. $$$ SHOP →

Abaca wicker basket Where the winter scarves disappear to. Texture and storage at once. $ SHOP →