

USING THE FIVE

Warm, but grounded

- Warm oat stays on the walls — the constant across all four seasons, a touch warmer now under the amber light.
- Ochre is the season's textile colour — a wool throw, a cushion, a runner. The first warm colour autumn lets you wear in the open, where summer would only allow a single note.
- Walnut is the gravity, and it matters most now. Dark wood is what keeps all this warmth from tipping into cosy-clutter. One walnut piece anchors a roomful of ochre.
- Dried sage is the botanical — pampas, dried grasses, seed heads, the muted green-grey of plants that have turned. Autumn's living thing is, beautifully, a dead one, kept.
- Ember is still the accent, just allowed a little more room — a terracotta vase, a band on a throw, the glow of a low lamp. Even now, two embers in one view is still one too many.

Warmth without walnut becomes clutter. The dark wood is what makes the cosy calm.
