

THE SEASON, IN FIVE-DAY WEEKS

Kanro — 寒露

Early October — "cold dew," when the morning air first carries winter's edge. Its three kō are a study in graceful endings.

First kō Wild geese return. The sky fills, briefly, with departure — the most beautiful goodbye in nature, written in formation.

Second kō Chrysanthemums bloom. The last great flower of the year opens just as everything else closes — late, deliberate, unbothered by the cold.

Third kō Crickets chirp around the door. The sound moves indoors, toward the warmth — and so, the almanac suggests, should we.

"The most beautiful thing the sky does all year, it does on its way out."
