

Bring the wool back down first. The throws and the heavier cushions that went up for summer return now, in ochre and oat — not piled, but layered the Japandi way, two weights of the same warm tone. The bare summer floor takes its rug again. The room re-dresses for the cold the way you do.

Then lower the light and warm it. Autumn is candlelight's season — a few low flames on the table do more for a gathered room than any fixture, and the flicker is the oldest hygge there is. Keep the lamps warm and few; let pools of low amber light, not brightness, define where the evening happens.

Last, the season's botanical — and here autumn is unique. Its living thing is a kept one: dried pampas, grasses, seed heads, branches turned and preserved. Three pampas plumes in a terracotta vase are the whole gesture, and they will last the season and the next. It is mono no aware made into décor: the beauty of the plant precisely at the moment it has turned.
